ALBERT SALMI

Albert Salmi (real name Alfred Salmi) was an American actor. He was born in 1928 at Brooklyn, New York and died in 1990. After serving in the Army during the Second World War, he used the GI Bill to study at the Dramatic Workshop of the American Theater Wing and the prestigious Actors Studio. He became a stage actor, eventually making it to Broadway, where his role as Bo Decker in 'Bus Stop' was his biggest stage success. A compromise between the stage and screen was live television drama, in which he was cast regularly. Salmi's very first film appearance was a choice role in 'The Brothers Karamazov', for which he turned down an Oscar nomination. The National Board of Review succeeded in presenting him with their award for the same picture, however. Salmi came to enjoy film work and actively seeked out parts in westerns. He then became a very familiar presence, especially on the TV screen, where he guest starred in many of the westerns and other series of the sixties and seventies. He committed suicide in 1990.

Gary Cooper was an American actor. He was born Frank James Cooper in 1901 at Helena, Montana and died in 1961. The son of a Montana state supreme court justice, he received his elementary schooling in England, later attending Wesleyan College, an agricultural school, in Montana and Grinnell College in Iowa. After graduation, he worked briefly as a guide at Yellowstone National Park and began submitting political cartoons to his hometown newspaper, the Helena Independent. In 1924, Cooper set out for California, hoping to become a cartoonist for a Los Angeles newspaper. Instead he found himself a door−to−door salesman for a photographer and space salesman for theatre curtain advertising. In 1925 he was introduced by friends to Hollywood casting directors and began playing cowboy extras in Westerns. During 1925 and early 1926 he appeared briefly in many films, including The Thundering Herd, Wild Horse Mesa, The Vanishing American, The Eagle, and The Enchanted Hill. He also played heavies in several two−reelers. His big break came in 1926, when he was cast as a last−minute replacement for the second lead in Goldwyn's 'The Winning of Barbara Worth', starring Ronald Colman and Vilma Banky. The film was a big box−office hit and it started Cooper on his way to becoming one of Hollywood's all−time great stars. Tall, handsome, and laconic, with a shy smile and a hesitant delivery, he had an immediate appeal to both male and female audiences and steadily moved to the top. In the eyes of millions the world over he came to personify the strong, silent American, a man of action and few words. At first taken lightly by the critics, he received more press coverage for his romantic escapades (with Clara Bow, Lupe Velez, Evelyn Brent, etc.) than for his acting in films. But he soon settled down, married socialite Veronica Balfe, who had briefly appeared in films as Sandra Shaw, and gradually developed a natural aptitude for screen acting. By the mid−30s he was generally accepted as a capable performer. His physique and nonchalant manner had been effective from the start in romantic and adventure films. Now his slightly awkward mannerisms and delayed reactions also proved to be perfect assets for screen comedy, under the guidance of such directors as Lubitsch and Capra. But above all, he remained most closely identified with his roles as a man of the American West. The diversity of his roles was reflected in two of his Oscar nominations: the 1946 'Mr Deeds Goes to Town', and the 1942 'The Pride of the Yankees'. He won his first Academy Award, as well as the New York Film Critics Award, for the 1941 'Sergeant York'. Cooper received another Oscar in 1952 for High Noon, perhaps his most memorable film, and received a Special Academy Award in the 1960 ceremony, held in April of 1961, for his many memorable screen performances and the international recognition he, as an individual, has gained for the motion picture industry. His close friend, James Stewart, accepted this last award in Cooper's behalf with tears in his eyes. He had just learned, along with a few other Cooper intimates, that the beloved star was suffering from incurable cancer. On May the 13th, 1961, about one month later, Gary Cooper died at 60.

Juano Hernandez was one of the first 'new style' of black screen actors, who neither sang nor danced but played characters just as white actors did. He grew up in Rio de Janeiro and in 1922 began performing onstage, working in an acrobatic act. Later he lived in the Caribbean and worked as a professional boxer under the name of Kid Curley. He went on to work in a minstrel show, in circuses, and in vaudeville. He debuted on Broadway in 1927 in Show Boat. He played a few bit parts in the black audience−targeted films of Oscar Micheaux, and also worked as a radio scriptwriter. He made his breakthrough as a screen actor in Intruder in the Dust in 1949, in which he played a proud black man wrongly accused of having killed a white Southerner. He played masculine, sensitive, individualistic men. After getting a number of solid roles, he was obliged to accept lesser roles in most of the films he made from the late '50s on. He continued acting until shortly before his death, working in both films and on TV.

JUDI DENCH

Dame Judi Dench is an English actress. She was born in 1934 at York. A five− time winner of the British Academy Award, she was granted an Order of the British Empire in 1970 and made a Dame of the British Empire in 1988. Dench made her stage debut as a snail in a junior school production. After attending art school, she studied acting at London's Central School of Speech and Drama and in 1957, made her professional stage debut as Ophelia in the Old Vic's Liverpool production of Hamlet. A prolific stage career followed, with seasons spent performing with the likes of the Royal Shakespeare Company and the National Theatre. Dench broke into film in 1964 with a supporting role in The Third Secret. The following year, she won her first BAFTA, a Most Promising Newcomer honor for her work in Four in the Morning. Although she continued to work in film, Dench earned most of her recognition and acclaim for her stage work. Occasionally she brought her stage roles to the screen in such film adaptations as A Midsummer Night's Dream in 1968 and Macbeth in 1978, in which she was Lady Macbeth to Ian McKellen's tormented king. It was not until the mid−1980s that Dench began to make her name known to an international film audience. In 1986, she had a memorable turn as a meddlesome romance author in A Room with a View, earning a Best Supporting Actress BAFTA for her tart portrayal. Two years later, she won the same award for her work in another period drama, A Handful of Dust. After her supporting role as Mistress Quickly in Kenneth Branagh's acclaimed 1989 adaptation of Henry V, Dench exchanged the past for the present with her thoroughly modern role as M in GoldenEye in 1995, the first of the Pierce Brosnan series of James Bond films. She portrayed the character for the subsequent Brosnan 007 films, lending flinty elegance to what had traditionally been a male role. The part of M had the advantage of introducing Dench to an audience unfamiliar with her work, and in 1997 she earned further international recognition, as well as an Oscar nomination and Golden Globe award, for her portrayal of Queen Victoria in Mrs. Brown. The following year, Dench did win the Oscar, garnering Best Supporting Actress honors for her eight− minute appearance as Queen Elizabeth in the acclaimed Shakespeare in Love. Her win resulted in the kind of media adulation usually afforded to actresses one−third her age. The following year, Dench continued to reap both acclaim and new fans with her work in Tea with Mussolini and the latest Bond extravaganza, The World is Not Enough. While her screen career has taken on an increasingly high− profile nature, Dench has continued to act on both television and the stage. In the former medium, she endeared herself to viewers with her work in such series as As Time Goes By and 'A Fine Romance' . On the stage, Dench made history in 1996, becoming the first performer to win two Olivier Awards for two different roles in the same year.

When she was nine, the stage name was changed to Garland, and the act eventually broke up when one of the sisters married. At the age of 13, Garland was hired by MGM, where she gained success as a teenage star, often opposite Mickey Rooney. Her career soared when she captivated audiences with her portrayal of Dorothy in The Wizard of Oz in 1939, a role initially slated for Shirley Temple, and one which won Garland a special Oscar. Several years later, Garland married musician David Rose, but divorced him four years later. In 1944, she starred in Meet Me in St Louis, and a year later married Vincente Minnelli, the film's director. She made a comeback with personal performances in London and New York and an excellent screen performance in A Star is Born in 1954. In the late 1950s, her career faltered again, and she was plagued with breakdowns, lawsuits, and chronic marital problems with Sid Luft, her third husband, whom she divorced in 1965.
